Synopsis

Inspired by true events, set in contemporary Belgrade, STITCHES tells the story of a woman who firmly believes that her newborn baby was stolen from her 18 years ago, while she was told that her baby died. With obsession and perseverance, she is fighting one last time against the police, the hospital bureaucracy and even her own family, in order to uncover the truth.

The Seamstress Story

"My dead baby is alive. He is 20 years old now."

- Drinka Radonjic. "TV Potraga" TV B92, Special Case 4, December 2009.

"Disappearing babies at the hospital: Serbia has to give answers about the children's fate and compensate the damages done to the parents"

- European Court of Human Rights, Press Release 26.3.2013.

"After pressure from the EU, Serbia has finally formed a committee to investigate and determine whether babies were systematically stolen from Belgrade hospitals over the course of many years. If these rumors are proven to be true, Serbia will be the third country exposed where such crimes occurred."

- Neskovic, Mirjana. "The Fate of Stolen Babies" Politika Serbian National Daily, March 2015

The script for "Stitches" is based on the testimonial of Drinka Radonjic, a seamstress from Belgrade who had been searching for her "dead son" for almost two decades. A few days after her delivery she had been told by her obstetrician that her infant son had died. But she never got his body or found out where the hospital buried him. She fought with hospital administration, doctors, police, courts, and municipality officials, in order to obtain the proper death certificate that would prove where her newborn son was buried. During the course of that long fight, she found more and more irregularities in the hospital documentation and official municipality papers that proved her doubts and belief that the baby never died. And after almost twenty years, she finally uncovered the truth.

Director's statement

The story of motherhood, oppression and the search for truth

I became a father for the first time in 2001. That same year, a few months before the biggest event of my life, I heard the story about the abductions of the newborn babies in hospitals. The story about their selling; false death certificates; deceived mothers and ruined families. The birth that was about to happen, provoked fear in me, not only due to the natural question if everything would be all right, but rather whether we would fall into a similar turn of events. Decisive in fighting this battle, I started to dig, investigate archives and look for witness that wanted and had something to tell about this matter; a matter that rarely rises in the press and seems more as a fiction than reality. Was it true? Maybe it was.

I've found in Archives of "Politika" (the oldest and most popular newspaper in Serbia) dozens of articles about abductions of the newborns.

All cases had the same pattern. The child is delivered. Tired mother is sedated. When she wakes up she is told that her baby has died. She is advised not to see the baby's body, as the body is treated as a pathological waste and it looks disturbing. The autopsies are incomplete and unsigned. The death certificates are fabricated. All documentation is either contradictory or incomplete. None of the cases have ever been solved. The majority of the cases had occurred during the late eighties and early nineties in the dawn of the war that tore Yugoslavia apart. I saw these events as the ultimate evidence of our human and moral deterioration that we still have not recovered from.

A few years ago I met Mrs. Drinka Radonjic. She was my aunt's seamstress. After twenty years she believed she had found her child and was proofing her case in court. I went to a tailor shop in the center of Belgrade to interview Mrs. Radonjic. She was a firm, brave and humble woman. Drinka found her son but he didn't want to meet her, as he was told that his mother abandoned him when he was born. She did not have a lawyer, she was representing herself in court.

There are over 500 families that are trying to find their children. There are over 500 different stories and many more unheard voices. I've decided to tell one of them.
